Choirs, music groups and other liturgical music

Congregational singing, choir singing and carol singing is not permitted, due to the increased risk of spreading virus to others present at the service. Solo singing in a religious setting such as a church or place of worship can only be done as part of an essential act of worship, and only if deemed appropriate following risk assessment. In order to sing without a face covering, the soloist should be more than 2 metres in all directions from the congregation and other individuals, including the musical accompanist and the celebrant.

If singing from an organ loft, it is essential that the organ loft is large enough to allow a minimum of 2 metres distance in all directions between the singer and the organist. If the loft is situated above the congregants, the soloist should be placed behind a plexiglass screen so that the risk of droplet transmission from the soloist over the edge of the loft and onto the congregation below is minimised. Music sheets, stands or microphones should only be used by the individual singing and not shared during the performance. These items and any surfaces that are touched during the performance should be cleaned between use if used by different persons. The singer and organist should be placed back to back, or side to side, rather than facing each other. It is important that the congregation is made aware that they should not sing along with the solo singer or other instrumental music.

Playing other instrumental music (e.g. string, percussion) is possible. A risk assessment should be completed before the musicians/ musical group practices and performs during the service. In addition, adequate and appropriate ventilation measures must be in place before, during and after the instrumental music is played as part of the religious service.

The 'STAR of BETHLEHEM', a phenomenon that occurred last in the 13th century can be seen on Monday about 45 minutes after sunset
